JUST WHAT THE DOCTOR ORDERED

“Pro-Life Pharmacy” Brings Out Friends; Foes

“Come for the price, stay for the service...and join our mission.” This is the slogan used by the nonprofit DMC Pharmacy.

Did we read that right? A pharmacy that is nonprofit? A pharmacy with a “mission”? Needless-to-say, the concept sounds rather intriguing. But what exactly is this “mission”?

“Our mission as a non-profit pharmacy is to offer superior pharmaceutical care—both traditional and clinical services—focusing on the individual in a family-oriented, pro-life environment,” reads DMC’s Mission and Vision Statement. “This is accomplished by respecting the dignity of each individual and being free of artificial contraceptive drugs and products. From the pre-born to the elderly, each is held in great esteem.”

To pro-life activists, the creation of a pharmacy where one may fill prescriptions with a clear conscience is a cause for celebration. To pro-abortion activists who do not believe in “choice,” however, the creation of such a pharmacy is cause for a new law.

In its 2009 session, the Virginia General Assembly considered a bill that would have closed pharmacies that do not fill all prescriptions. Proponents claimed the law was needed to assure that customers are not treated with “indignity” or “humiliation” and to prevent “breaches in confidentiality.” The legislation was changed to require pharmacies that do not fill prescriptions for birth control to post a sign to that effect. The bill was defeated in committee.

A spokesman for DMC said the proposed legislation was aimed at a nonexistent problem. “The bill targeting the DMC Pharmacy is an example of the pro-abortion agenda present even within the once conservative state of Virginia,” he said. “These incidents show that all pro-life institutions, especially pro-life...enterprises, must remain vigilant...”

It is actually not surprising that a pro-abortion member of the Virginia legislature would propose such a bill. Pro-abortion activists have been decrying DMC’s existence for quite some time. Virginia’s pro-abortion lobby released an attack piece titled, “Boycott DMC Pharmacy: A Pharmacy that Doesn’t Respect Your Choices Doesn’t Deserve Your Business.” DMC refuses “to stock birth control, emergency contraception or even condoms,” the NARAL Pro-Choice Virginia article began. And just why is this so appalling? Because, according to pro-abortion zealots, “birth control is basic healthcare.”

“Improving access to birth control is at the forefront of our efforts to prevent unintended pregnancy and reduce the need for abortion,” NARAL declared. “For the 98 percent of American women who use some form of contraception during their lives, birth control is basic, essential health care. More than 40 million women of reproductive age are sexually active and want to prevent unintended pregnancy.”

Birth control is not healthcare, much less basic healthcare. But indoctrinating Americans with this mantra is necessary if pro-abortion activists are to reach their goals—taxpayer funding and unlimited availability of birth control, including abortifacient methods. NARAL Pro-Choice Virginia claimed that 98 percent of American women will use some form of birth control in their lifetimes. “So why is DMC Pharmacy refusing to sell it?” the group asked. Apparently, decisions regarding what products a business will carry and sell are not a matter of, well, “choice.”

“The decision of whether to get pregnant is one that should be made by a woman—not by other people who want to impose their beliefs on her,” the pro-abortion lobby claimed. “But a growing number of pharmacists are refusing to fill women’ [sic] legally prescribed birth control prescriptions...” Just how the existence of a pharmacy that does not carry birth control imposes beliefs when no one is forcing the customer to go to the establishment is not explained because there is no logical argument to defend such a statement. After all, it is not as though DMC is the only pharmacy in the world. Not unexpectedly, NARAL Pro-Choice Virginia urged its supporters to sign a pledge to boycott pharmacies where employees “impose their own beliefs on women...” Activists were encouraged to spread the word:

If you or the women in your life use contraception, we need you to add your voice to this issue. Take the pledge to boycott pharmacies that refuse to fill birth control prescriptions. Then take the next step by downloading our petition and circulating it among your family and friends.

The petition is one of the oldest and most commonly used tricks used to collect the names and addresses of people who will be sent fund-raising material.

Last year, the Washington Post reported that DMC Pharmacy is “one of a small but growing number of drugstores around the country that have become the latest front in a conflict pitting patients’ rights against those of health-care workers who assert a ‘right of conscience’ to refuse to provide care or products that they find objectionable.” The newspaper noted that the pharmacies are “emerging at a time when a variety of health-care workers are refusing to perform medical procedures they find objectionable...Ambulance drivers have refused to transport patients for abortions. Anesthesiologists have refused to assist in sterilizations.”

Berlinger

“If you are a health-care professional, you are bound by professional obligations,” said Nancy Berlinger, deputy director of the Hastings Center, a bioethics “think tank” in Garrison, N.Y. “You can’t say you won’t do part of that profession.” Okay, why not?

Writer and New York City resident Brett Singer offered his opinion on babble.com, which describes itself as “the [online] magazine and community for a new generation of parents.” The article began with a satirical phone call:

DMC Pharmacy, can we help you?

Oh, you want birth control pills. I’m sorry, we can’t help you with that. No, we don’t sell condoms either. How about this pamphlet on the Rhythm Method? Perhaps a new Bible? Hello? Hello, are you there?

Singer gave his synopsis of DMC’s philosophy. “Basically, if you’re going to ‘do it,’ you should be prepared for the pitter-patter of little feet,” he wrote. “That means no condoms, no birth control pills, no morning after pill—nada. Zip. The ‘family planning’ aisle will be filled with rosary beads, Left Behind novels and snacks filled with nothing but high (moral) fiber.” Clearly, Singer’s own philosophy is riddled with religious bigotry. “I wonder how far the store will take this,” he continued. “Would they sell copies of The Da Vinci Code? How about Hustler? Jolt Cola?”

Surprisingly, after ridiculing the concept of a pro-life pharmacy, Singer defended it:

I think they have a right to keep contraceptives off the shelves; I’m not a lawyer but I’m fairly certain that no private store has a legal obligation to sell any product that they don’t want to. Manhattan is filled with drugstores advertising a staff that will help you get your health insurance company to pay for fertility treatments, which is something not typically offered at your local Walgreen’s. Different strokes, different folks. I do have a problem with a pharmacist who works at a “regular” pharmacy...refusing to fill any prescription, or a health-care worker who goes against the policies of their employer. You are absolutely entitled to your beliefs, but don’t you also have to do the job that you were hired for? That’s another legal question I don’t claim to know the answer to.

While Singer defends the right of pro-life pharmacies to exist, he would participate in a boycott of them. “Personally, even though I don’t need birth control pills myself, I would gladly avoid a store that took a stance against them. The best way to stop stores like this from proliferating is simply to not shop there.”

Marcia Greenberger of the pro-abortion National Women’s Law Center told the Washington Post she is “very, very troubled” by the existence of such pharmacies. “Contraception is essential for women’s health. A pharmacy like this is walling off an essential part of health care. That could endanger women’s health.” This woman would win the award for best actress in an overly dramatic pro-abortion rant hands down.

“These people would have us believe that every time a pro-life pharmacy is opened, birth control becomes less available,” said LDI President Douglas R. Scott, Jr. “This is nonsense and they know it.” Scott said pro-abortion groups often use “the sky is falling” rhetoric to advance their agenda, regardless of how absurd doing so may be.

Lomasky

“In general, I think product differentiation expressive of differing values is a very good thing for a free, pluralistic society,” said Loren E. Lomasky, a professor of political philosophy, policy and law in the Department of Philosophy at the University of Virginia. “If we can have 20 different brands of toothpaste, why not a few different conceptions of how pharmacies ought to operate?”

“This allows a pharmacist who does not wish to be involved in stopping a human life in any way to practice in a way that feels comfortable,” Karen Brauer, president of Pharmacists for Life International, told the Washington Post. Tom Brejcha, president and chief counsel for the Chicago-based Thomas More Society, said, “The United States was founded on the idea that people act on their conscience—that they have a sense of right and wrong and do what they think is right and moral. Every pharmacist has the right to do the same thing.”

Some critics have wondered how pharmacies justify dispensing drugs for erectile dysfunction but not birth control. “The owners of these ‘new-age anti-pre-marital-family-control' pharmacies say that contraceptives cause infidelity and sexual deviance," wrote liberal blogger Frank Hinton ("Something Leftish"). "However, most of these pharmacies do sell Viagra, the 'Jesus-Med' of Pro-Life Pharmacies." The bigoted writer referenced a statement by the Vatican that he claimed serves as "their very own 'hall-pass' from the Pope, el Papa himself!":

Service to the integrity and well-being of the individual is the ideal that must constantly guide the Catholic pharmacist. As he exercises his profession, he should be inspired by the example of "Jesus of Nazareth, who went about doing good and healing" (Acts 10:38) all those who approached him. Thus the pharmacist should be concerned with "relieving suffering, improving treatment and curing men's ailments", conscious that where there is life, there is the Spirit of God who is our Creator and Consolar.

A display of bigotry from the "Something Leftish" blog.

"WAIT a minute," Hinton wrote. "Pharmacists should be concerned with 'relieving suffering'? Doesn't this papal reflection extend itself to a woman that was raped and needs help? Doesn't curing men's ailments mean protecting those who are violated by criminal perverts?" (Okay, so this is definitely not an example of witty intelligence.)

"Why do you care about the sexual health of men but not women?" asked Anita L. Nelson, a professor of obstetrics and gynecology at the David Geffen School of Medicine at UCLA. "If he gets his Viagra, why can't she get her contraception?" Well, maybe it is because Viagra is not an abortifacient drug.

"We're trying not to leave our faith at the door," said John Bruchalski, M.D., chairman of DMC Pharmacy's parent organization. "We're trying to create an environment where belief and professionalism come together." Robert Semler, the pharmacist who operates DMC, starts each workday with staff prayer. "Being a faith-based workplace, it's a logical thing to do," he said.

DMC Pharmacy currently operates a store in and ships throughout Virginia. It is authorized to ship to Georgia, Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania. Maryland will soon be added to this list. Pro-life advocates residing elsewhere should contact the company and ask to be informed if and when a permit is granted to ship their state.

"I am thrilled that DMC Pharmacy exists and I will definitely become a customer," said LDI's Scott. "The existence of such consumer choice is a welcome addition to the Pro-Life Movement. Besides, with the Pro-Abortion Movement this upset, it's got to be a good thing." Scott said he hopes pro-life consumers will take the advice of NARAL and spread the word. "DMC Pharmacy has just plugged one more hole in the dike that is holding back the forces of death and we thank God for them."

WAS MARGARET SANGER A RACIST?

Planned Parenthood is active on popular social websites such as Facebook and MySpace. One of its supporters, Jessica Johnson, posted a question on the pro-abortion group's Facebook page:

i [sic] have been debating on some pro life [Facebook] pages...and alot [sic] of pro lifers have claimed that Margaret Sanger was a racist and trying to ride the black population through the practice of putting family planning clinics in poor or minority neighborhoods so that they are less likely to reproduce. Is there any true [sic] to this?

Several Planned Parenthood apologists tried to defend Sanger. Bimini Brown of Ithaca, N.Y., pointed Johnson to a New York University website that would allow her to research the Planned Parenthood founder. A PPFA employee steered Johnson to the group's own website for a defense of Sanger's beliefs and practices. PPFA also commented on the website Brown had recommended:

The Sanger Papers Project is highly reputable. PPFA President Cecile Edwards sits on its advisory board. Other members of the board are writers Ellen Chesler and Linda Gordon; Sanger grandchildren Margaret Sanger Lampe and Alexander Sanger, historian James Reed, and Sherrill Redmon, who is the archivist for the collections of Sanger and PPFA papers at the Sophia Smith Collection at Smith College. There is no better source for information about Margaret Sanger

First of all, the surname of PPFA's president is Richards; not Edwards. Second, it is interesting that PPFA employees believe the very presence of Richards and Sanger's descendants on the advisory board makes the project "very reputable."

Johnson apparently took the advice she was given and did a little research (errors too numerous to note):

i absolutely support planned parenthood but it seems like she was racist and thats a problem. the only way i can overlook that discrimination is that she provided birth control that is now available to women around the world and she gave women hope to control their bodies and family size...

Hallie Frankle had read Johnson's comments on Lila Rose's website, noting that they have been removed. "I guess you rattled them a bit," surmised the Scranton, Penn., resident before turning to an attack on religion. "After all, alleged deities are no match for logic and facts! Such hypocrisy and misogyny are self-defeating. Just because Lila and her ilk are too feeble-minded to accept responsibility for their own bodies doesn't mean the rest of us can't..." Johnson responded by saying it is a "waste of time" to bother with Rose's website because pro-lifers are "so closed minded." Interestingly, the demeaning word "feble-minded" was commonly used by Sanger herself.

Harmsen

One person sought to simply dismiss claims against Sanger. "She may have been racist, I don't really know myself. But it doesn't really matter," wrote Monica Harmsen. "Whether or not she was a racist doesn't validate or invalidate her opinions on birth control. If a pro-lifer is throwing that out as support against [sic], they must not have a very good argument." This response apparently did not sit well with PPFAs as it has been deleted.

Of course, some people just do not get the picture. "Margaret Sanger... we need you again," wrote Michele Corda of Westchester, N.Y. "So true," responded Seattle resident Liisa Cushing. "That woman was an angel."

While Johnson has been fooled by Planned Parenthood rhetoric, there is a hint of intellectual honesty. She took on the abortion-committing group over two relatively recent events (errors too numerous to note):

the bigger problem [compared to Sanger's racism] is the cover up of sexual abuse that lila rose caught on tape, she wouldnt have a voice right now if she hadnt caught anything illegal which unfortunately she did. planned parenthood is amazing i support them, donate and volunteer but if clinic workers are gonna ignore a 14 year old pregnant with a 30 year olds baby thats wrong and needs to be dealt with and not let it happen anymore because lila IS gearing up now to start shooting new undercover so please lets not give her anything worthy to shoot:)

im not going to deny that margaret sanger was an amazing woman but thats not even the big issue. the problem is planned parenthood let someone call their clinics with racist motives to kill a minority baby and they were very eager and excited to take that donation. not only that but the sexual abuse if ridiculous and 31 year old should be reported thats rape! dont get me wrong i LOVE planned parenthood and nothing like this has happened in the clinics i have been to but again its a problem for those that has an it should be fixed immediately!

Who Do You Think You Are?

"Sarah L." posed this question in an e-mail to LDI:

Trying to shut down planned parent hoods [sic], you want to know something?

I had one of your religious zealot buddies tell me they wouldn't give me a birth control prescription. I GOT IT ANYWAYS [sic]! HAHHAHA! You can't stop people, IT IS NOT YOUR PLACE TO PARENT THIS WORLD AND MAKE RULES FOR GROWN PEOPLE! What are you going to do? NOTHING! But bitch and complain while others LAUGH at your ridiculous plight.

If you were REALLY that concerned about human life you would be putting efforts into a homeless center, not taking RIGHTS away, YOU WILL NEVER WIN THAT FIGHT I PROMISE YOU! AND THEY ARE MY R I G H T S !!!!!

GET A CLUE!

Your beliefs ARE NOT everyone else's [sic]! YOU CANNOT PUSH RELIGION, AND WE ALL KNOW THIS IS WHAT IT'S ABOUT! GET A REAL JOB AND LEAVE PEOPLE ALONE! You are NOT GOD as much as you would like to be and YOU HAVE NO PROOF OF A GOD so let others make their own choices in life you illogical and irrational god ***** [expletive deleted] zealots, you all are a bunch of women who probably don't have a real job, living off their husbands popping out kids every year while you rally outside of clinics.

YOU ARE DISGUSTING and I WILL SEE TO IT that your ridiculous campaign comes to an end.

You just wait, [sic] your voices won't be heard over what I and many others have to say. This is just the beginning.

ZEALOTS! Your time is over, [sic] make way for the 21st century and FREEDOM!

Christ like? HAH! Not you guys!

The e-mail was signed, "FREE CITIZEN ON THE 21st CENTURY." (Did she say we are all a "bunch of women" and then call us "guys"?)

Abortion Apologists Of A Feather...

We wonder if Cassandra Noboa is Sarah's friend:

The sheer ignorance that fuels your organization is truly a disgrace to humanity. How ironic that the same people who claim to be “pro-life” are also Pro-War! So, you want to have control of a woman’s body and make laws that don’t allow her to have the right or the freedom to make a life long [sic] decision, which effects [sic] more than one party! Yet, when babies and civilians are being bombed in Iraq, you turn a blind eye to the many lives that are being stolen! Let me get it straight, you want voice when the baby is not born yet once they are, you can care less if they are are [sic] given food, healthcare, quality education.....[sic] I will never understand how disgustingly [sic] hypocritical your “cause” is. If you really care about human lives than why aren’t you voting for the humanitarian [sic] rights of the children and people who are breathing and living right now? How easy it is for you to stop caring once a child is born. In all honesty, if you don’t believe in abortions then don’t have one, but allow humanity to continue to have the right over their own bodies. Unless you are “Pro-Life” to the end of one’s life, fighting and protesting their human rights, than you have no right to give yourself the title.

Sarah and Cassandra have done nothing more than regurgitate basic and illogical pro-abortion rhetoric. Well, maybe doing so made them feel better about the horrific practice they support.

“Pro-Choice” vs. Pro-Abortion

Why do you always say “pro-abortion” instead of “pro-choice”? Nobody is pro-abortion.

- Chris Deavers

“Pro-choice” was a term created by those who support abortion (legal or otherwise) because it sounds more “American.” After all, who could oppose “choice”? The move was brilliant and the term has bought the Movement many supporters that would otherwise oppose abortion. But it must be remembered that, since the term was created to direct public attention away from the real issue, we should not allow those who seek to do so to dictate our “choice” of language.

“Pro-Choice”

Is it not strange that such terminology has been reserved for those who support legal abortion? When a person claims to be “pro-choice,” it is obvious that abortion is the issue to which he or she is referring. Similarly, no one has ever heard a person say, “I am not pro-capital punishment; I am pro-choice on capital punishment. If the state chooses to use it, that’s its choice.” And no one has ever heard a person say, “I am not pro-slavery; I am pro-choice on slavery. I would not own a slave, but who am I to tell someone else they may not? I don’t want to impose my morality on those who, in consultation with their family and pastor, may choose to own a slave.” (If slaveholders had come up with the “pro-choice” mantra and people had embraced the slogan without thinking through its ramifications, the tragic practice would likely have continued into the Twentieth Century.)

“Pro-choice” is not the only example of verbal engineering LDI has rejected. We do not use the phrase “embryonic stem cell research” because “research” sounds like a good thing. LDI prefers to use “embryonic stem cell experimentation,” which we believe more accurately describes the practice.

By the way, there are many people who are pro-abortion, regardless of how they may choose to characterize the position.

Touchy, Touchy!

Kelly sent us a copy of her e-mail to Neal Horsley, a supporter of killing abortionists and a perpetual candidate for governor of Georgia. “I almost made my donation to your campaign, but realized that you are using PayPal. Are you not aware that eBay, the parent co. of PayPal, is a supporter of Planned Parenthood?” Kelly wrote. Horsley was quick to respond:

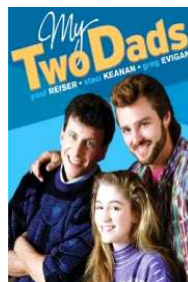

I’m aware that we are all of us collaborating with virtually every corporation on earth that is, on one way or another, funding the things we all call sin. I embody a plan to organize an army to stop it. Your response is just another of a long list of ways my enemies find to refuse to help me.

This article [attached to Horsley’s e-mail]...explains why I am a murderer, and you are too, but that does not stop me from doing everything in my power to stop it using every means at my disposal: [sic]

Your pretense that you somehow exempt yourself from being a murderer because you don’t use PayPal is the most obvious form of self-deceit. Such self-deceived people have never supported me. And I don’t expect you will be the exception.

What Horsley did not know is that Kelly intended to send a donation by mail since she did not want to use PayPal. But then Kelly received Horsley’s reply, which she described as “irrational, defensive and full of pitiable excuses.”

“CHILDREN’S SONG” PROMOTES AGENDA

“My Two Dads” was the name of an NBC sitcom that starred Paul Reiser, Greg Evigan, and Staci Keanan. The show centered on two single men who had competed for the affections of “Marcy Bradford.” Upon Marcy’s death, the men were granted joint custody of her daughter, “Nicole.” (Actual paternity was never revealed.) The escapades of the two men raising a teen girl provided the basis for the story each week. While the show was short lived (1987-1990), its cancellation was certainly not due to controversy.

Uphoff singing about his two fathers.

“Two Fathers” is the name of a song that may be found on several popular websites, including YouTube. In the video, a woman asks a large group of children, “Who is here...with their mother?” Several children raised a hand. Her next question was, “Who’s here with their father?” A smaller number of hands went up. “And who has two fathers?” the host asked. “There are a few who have that,” she said, pointing into the crowd. “Terence has that, too, and he’s singing a song about two fathers.” Out stepped Terence Uphoff (around 11 years old), who began to sing:

We live in a terrace house.
We have nice stuff at home.

We live there quite okay with three of us together.

Bas works for the newspaper.
And Diederik is laboratorian.

They adopted me when I was one year old.

I’m still the only child.
But that’s okay with me.

That way I get all the attention and love from those two.

Bas brings me to the school.
With Diederik I play violin.

And with three of us we watch soaps on TV.

(CHORUS) I have two fathers.
Two real fathers.

Sometimes cool and sometimes strict.
But it’s going great with us.

I have two fathers.
Two real fathers.

Who, if they have to...
Both can be my mother.

When I have to go to bed.
Diederik checks my homework.
And Bas does the dishes or is doing laundry.

And if I’m ill or have a fever.
Then there’s nobody I know.

Who can be so caring as Diederik or Bas.

(CHORUS sung by all children) He has two fathers.
Two real fathers.

Sometimes cool and sometimes strict.
But it’s going great with us.

He has two fathers.
Two real fathers.

Who, if they have to...
Both can be my mother.

Sometimes I get bullied at school.
Of course it’s not nice.

“Your parents, they are homo!”
They find it strange.

Then I just shrug my shoulders.
So what! I’m their son!

It’s not ordinary.
But for me, it’s quite okay.

(CHORUS sung by all children) He has two fathers.
Two real fathers.

Sometimes cool and sometimes strict.
But it’s going great with us.

He has two fathers.
Two real fathers.
Who, if they have to...
Both can be my mother.

Kinderen voor Kinderen (“Children for Children”) is a choir run by the Hilversum-based (Netherlands) VARA Broadcasting. It has released one album of new “children’s” songs every year since 1980. The songs on each album are presented in an annual television special. Choir members range in age from eight to 12 years.

Public reaction to “Two Fathers” has been mixed, but most comments posted on YouTube were positive. The few people courageous enough to express an opposing opinion were subjected to name-calling, labeled “ignorant” and “intolerant Neanderthals,” and summarily dismissed:

I just feel really sad for you. I have two dads, like the boy in the video, and all the ignorance about families like mine just makes me feel discouraged. This is 2009, but I guess you’d never know it. There’s nothing wrong with being gay. Gay people are the same as straight people, and anyone else’s sex life is really none of your business. You’re obsessed with it and fixated on it. It says more about you than it does about gay people.

Planned Parenthood’s website “celebrates” homosexuality.

Homosexuality is just one of the subjects tackled by the choir. Others turned into songs include animal rights, discrimination, divorce, environmental activism, escapism, puberty, superstition, vegetarianism, and war. This is an example of adults using children to promote an agenda.
